

Hiring Recordkeeping Guide

Synthetic training material for a local demonstration. Apply the organization's approved process; this document is not legal advice.

Documenting evidence

For each decision-relevant criterion, save the interview question or work sample, factual evidence, score, anchor, and reviewer rationale.

Cite the job description or rubric section used. Do not copy unrelated candidate details into the record.

A second reviewer should be able to understand the reasoning without relying on undocumented impressions.

Correction process

If a record is inaccurate, preserve the original value and submit a correction with the corrected value, reason, reviewer identity, and timestamp.

Do not silently overwrite an earlier decision or erase an audit trail.

If a correction changes the recommendation, return it to the authorized reviewer before execution.

Retention schedule

Keep candidate records only for the period defined by the organization's approved retention schedule.

The corpus does not define a statutory retention period; consult the authorized records or legal owner for the applicable schedule.

When the period expires, delete or de-identify records through an auditable process, subject to an authorized hold.

Access controls

Grant candidate record access by assigned role and business need; recruiters submit profiles and reviewers handle the decision queue.

Do not share candidate records through public links, personal accounts, or unapproved channels.

Review access when responsibilities change and record access or decision events according to the approved process.

Escalation

Pause the workflow when evidence conflicts, a required criterion is unclear, a possible accommodation is raised, or the record may be biased or incomplete.

Send the issue to the designated authorized human owner with only the minimum necessary candidate information.

Resume only after the issue is resolved and the rationale is recorded; never let an AI fallback make the final decision.
